HIGH FLYERS

t takes real drive to start a successful business, but to repeat the trick and then do it again in a completely different field takes a very special set of skills.

Eddie Chang has done just that, and his latest venture, a financial start-up providing "insurtech" products and services on a mobile platform, looks set to take Hong Kong's insurance sector into a whole new era.

"I saw great opportunities to simplify the way people buy insurance policies and make claims, believing it should keep pace with the needs of the digital generation," says the founder and chief executive of What really got Chang thinking was breaking his camera while on holiday in Britain. The subsequent claim involved four forms, a visit to the service centre to photograph the damage, and no small amount of frustration. He realised there had to be a better way.

"It didn't make sense," he says. "If you look at other industries with online purchasing or multimedia downloads, users can buy anything from anyone on the same platform. But if you went to an insurance website, it didn't tell you the cost, how to buy or how to file a claim. They expected you to go to an agent."

So, Chang met the fintech division of the Insurance Authority, secured an agency licence, hired programmers to develop in-house systems and an app, teamed up with reputable partners - Allied World Assurance and TransUnion, who provide the actual policies - and forged ahead.

The first step was to offer travel insurance, with life cover and other products to follow. On the app, Amy, a "personal assistant" powered by AI, answers questions and guides users through a step-by-step process to buy insurance or make claims. Items like medical reports and photos can be scanned and uploaded. Most claims are processed in five to seven days. And payouts are made by cheque or - in future - by transfer to an e-wallet.

"Officially, our role is as an agency," Chang says. "But basically customers do everything on the platform, and we want to invent more tools they can have at their fingertips."

Chang grew up in Kwun Tong, where his mother was a housewife and his father was often away at sea. An interest in technology saw him make a walkie-talkie (an acknowledged failure) and a hi-fi system (a definite success) by his early teens, and that spurred further experimentation.

Subsequently, he took a three-year higher diploma in marine electronics, graduating in 1984 from Hong Kong Polytechnic University, and went straight into the PC industry as an engineer. Working for a small firm, his main task was designing plug-in "hard cards", but he also saw up close how the industry operated and what it would take to advance.

In 1991, aged 29, he took a leap in the dark and set up Zida Computer Technologies to make motherboards and peripherals. A factory in Shenzhen became the main centre of operations and, with exports to retailers in Europe and the Americas booming, the workforce grew to around 2,000.

"At times, it was a struggle, but I learned from everyday problems and from my mistakes," Chang says.

The firm went public in 2000, but sensing a need for change, Chang took a threeweek holiday in Australia, and returned to found GFI Group. He wanted a less sizeable business, with more "intelligence" and less day-to-day management, and focused on the technical development of IT products and apps for mobile devices and the internet of things (IoT).

"In a new start-up, you are riding a roller coaster," Chang says. "Every day, you face new difficulties and must find solutions, which makes it quite unlike a 'normal' business, which runs on a loop.'

For Wesurance, that has so far meant challenging fixed thinking, improving the first version of the app based on user feedback, and broadening the target market from millennials to all types of customers.

"For a company to succeed, the most important things are environment, positioning and people," he says. "You'll always find opportunities, but you should be like an eagle looking for a fish under the water. That is part of my personality."

When time allows, Chang boards his 65-foot motor cruiser at Clearwater Bay and heads to the islands off Sai Kung to relax and contemplate what the future holds.

"Jobs will change, and people won't have more 'knowledge' than the search engine," he says. "Therefore, we should tell youngsters the truth: in the years ahead, they will need wisdom, judgement and imagination, not knowledge in the traditional sense."

Frustrating stuff

am completely fed up with rude and unprofessional recruiters. A few months ago, one of them contacted me about a job and asked me to send her a CV. When I heard nothing after a couple of weeks, I sent a follow-up email, but received no response.

Several weeks later, the same person emailed me about a different position. She said she was sending the employer my CV, but again there was no follow-up. Yesterday, I received yet another email from her regarding a possible job.

At this point, I'm so angry that I want to tell this woman exactly what I think about her disrespectful behaviour. Why do recruiters act like

Your frustration with unresponsive recruiters is shared by many jobseekers. But while some may indeed be inconsiderate, this lack of communication typically stems from the nature of the recruiting process itself.

When searching for viable candidates, recruiters consider applicants from a wide range of sources and then contact those who appear to be a possible match for the job. While the applicant may view this as the start of a promising relationship, in reality it may just be the first step in narrowing a large field.

Because many recruiters lack the administrative support needed to follow up with everyone, priority is given to those applicants who are most appealing to the employers who have paid for this service. The unfortunate result is that many preliminary contacts are simply left

This does not let recruiters off the hook, however. Instead of making anxious applicants wait for an email that will never come, they need to establish reasonable expectations. Every contact should be told exactly what will happen next, including the likelihood of receiving feedback.

As for your own situation, don't shoot yourself in the foot. Since this woman continues to reach out, your connection with her may eventually pay off. But if you lash out in frustration, you won't hear from her again, because no one wants to hire an angry person. So, there is no point in losing your cool over it. AP

CAREER DOCTOR

Am I risking friendships by battling for promotion?

y line superior has handed in his resignation and it looks like the company will recruit internally to replace him. I think I would have a good chance of getting the job but I know that two colleagues from my department are also thinking of it.

They are both good friends and I am wary of us falling out if one of us gets the job. Do you think going for the promotion is worth a potentially acrimonious race? Terri

Yes, it is definitely worth going for the promotion. First of all, start by asking yourself how you would feel if one of your friends were promoted ahead of you (especially if you are more qualified)? Apart from the fact that quite clearly your friends are obviously not worried (otherwise, they would not be applying), if you decide not to go for promotion just because you are worried about how your colleagues will feel, then you will never get far up the corporate ladder.

I am a huge believer in collaboration and driving an open, transparent, fun and friendly culture in the workplace so it is great that you have close friends at work. However, this is your professional career and, at some point, if you are going to go for a promotion then you have to compete with (and potentially then manage) people that are your friends.

If you do end up managing them or vice versa, then there is no question the relationship changes but the ability to adapt accordingly is part of building a successful career.

There is no need for the process to become acrimonious and if your company handles the process correctly and transparently then you should be given a fair opportunity, as should your colleagues (if this doesn't happen then that's a different story).

Going for a promotion can be an extremely scary process for many people and it takes them out of their comfort zone. They begin to ask themselves numerous questions. Am I qualified? What will my colleagues think? How do I ensure I get credibility? Am I going to add value?

These are all questions that even highly qualified professionals struggle to answer.

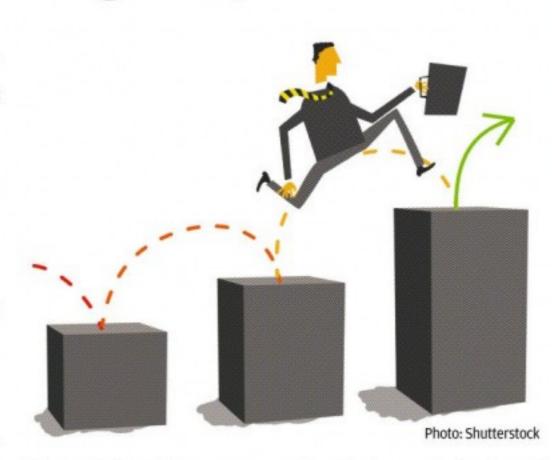

Often organisations may look internally and externally if there is a vacant role so it is important to treat any such selection process seriously if there are a number of candidates, and I recommend being fully prepared.

You will be in a much stronger position to make your case if you are fully readied and know what to expect. This means performing research as to what the process will entail, anticipating what your employers are looking for and identifying and understanding your strengths and weaknesses, as well as how to position and sell your experience.

Also, know your worth in the market and to the company. In the end, I would focus on the bigger picture. If the promotion goes to someone else then be gracious and professional. Do not take it badly and throw your toys out of the pram.

You can always ask for feedback on what you might need to achieve in order to be promoted in the future. And remember, performing well during an assessment process, even if you do not win the role, will only increase your credibility internally and put you in a stronger position for future internal opportunities.

If you really do feel the process was unfair then you can always look for external opportunities, but do not burn bridges by storming out of the company just because your friend was promoted ahead of you. That will not help you in the future, either in your professional or social life. So it is best to keep your cool and makes amends on your own bat.

香港科技大學 THE HONG KONG UNIVERSITY OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Director of Center for Language Education

Founded in 1991, the Hong Kong University of Science and Technology (HKUST) is a world renowned international research university dedicated to the advancement of learning and scholarship, with special emphasis on postgraduate education and close collaboration with industry and business. It promotes interdisciplinary studies and is dedicated to educating rounded students who have acquired a strong entrepreneurial spirit and innovative thinking with a global outlook. In its short history, the University has come to be regarded as a leading player in the international higher education scene. HKUST has been ranked among the top universities in Asia by QS Asian University Rankings. It ranks 12th in the latest Global Employability University Survey reported by the New York Times, and No.1 in the Greater China area. English is the medium of teaching, research and administration.

HKUST has a total of around 14,800 students with 9,700 undergraduate (UG) and 5,000 postgraduate (PG) students; 34% are non-local and come from more than 30 countries around the world. The University also has a successful exchange program with over 200 partners worldwide. Approximately 40% of students experience a semester-long exchange as part of their studies.

The primary mission of the HKUST Center for Language Education (CLE) is to deliver the University's language enhancement programs for English and Chinese to UG and PG students from all Schools in the University. Compulsory English and Chinese communication courses account for 15 of 120 credits of the UG degree. In addition, the Center contributes to the teaching of English writing for courses in the UG Common Core and for PG students. The Center offers a Master of Arts degree in International Language Education with separate concentrations in English and Chinese teaching. It also provides a Third Languages program and co-curricular activities. The Center currently offers seven language MOOCs via edX and Coursera.

The CLE Director provides overall leadership and strategic direction for the Center and plays a key role in developing and monitoring the UG and PG programs for all Schools. Reporting to the Dean of Humanities and Social Science, the CLE Director is the administrative head of a unit of more than 80 full-time teaching staff and 22 nonacademic support staff.

Applicants should have a doctoral degree in a relevant area but very strong candidates without such a degree will also be considered; substantial experience in developing and administering English for Academic Purposes (EAP) and English for Specific Purposes (ESP) programs at university level; demonstrated commitment to excellence in curriculum development and pedagogy; proven qualities of leadership, entrepreneurship and managerial capability involving multiple stakeholders in a multilingual and multicultural academic environment.

Terms & Applications/Nominations

Appointment to the position will be on a three-year fixed term basis, renewable by mutual agreement. Competitive remuneration and generous fringe benefits, including housing where appropriate, will be provided.

The executive search firm Perrett Laver is working with HKUST in this recruitment exercise, and will support the Search Committee in the execution of its duties.
